Q: Preserving dynamic object properties on POST request I have created a object to represent a list of CustomControls. The end goal is to POST this object back to the server, however, the content is stored in the form of a List [HttpPost] public ActionResult SubmitCustomControls(CustomControls customControls) { //Now when I send this object back to the server, //customControls.count Property is null. //If I serialize it before sending it back to the server, //customControls.count has been serialized properly. return View(); } CustomControls object public class CustomControls { public Control[] controls { get; set; } public int count { get; set; } } public class Control { public Control[] controls { get; set; } public string type { get; set; } } Index.cshtml @model List @using (Html.BeginForm()) { for(int i=0; i m[i].type, new { @id = "control" + i, @class = "form-control" }) @foreach (Control control in @Model[i].controls) { @Html.TextBoxFor(m => m[i].controls[control.Index].control, new { @id = "control", @class = "form-control" }) }

What's New In Adobe Photoshop CC 2019?

Related The Scottish Liberal Democrats have vowed to keep on telling the truth about the independence referendum after a Ukip source was last week shown on BBC Scotland pleading not to be sacked by the broadcaster over his party's "lies". The head of Ukip's Scottish party, Marcus Paterson, told ITV News that allegations made by an SNP insider that he had hired a PR agency to prepare an anti-independence film and then lied about the film were lies, but he accepted that he should have checked his sources before making a public comment about it. But Danny Kinahan, the former deputy Scottish leader of the Lib Dems who will soon become the first minister of London, said the same person was to blame for the 'lies' anyway because they were part of a script to win votes. Ken Macintosh, the former head of digital communications at the Scottish Liberal Democrats, confirmed this in a blog on his own website. He said that he had found that the same media agency - now defunct - which produced the infamous image of the British bulldog smoking a cigar, who had been used to portray the bully the SNP wanted the public to see, had also been hired to produce a 'positive' image of the very same politician. Mr Kinahan said: "When you are writing a story for the Guardian or Telegraph or whatever. You are writing a script. It's my job to tell the truth, but it's their job to lie. "Everybody knows it. Is it that hard to check a story before you broadcast it. The same person who is telling the truth about the film was the same person who told lies about the film in an interview with the Herald. "Is it that hard to check sources? I mean, could you not look and check the facts, like I did, before I made an allegation? It's lies. "I don't care how he is trying to spin it, it is lies and it is lies that I'm getting this from the same person. They are using the same person to tell lies and, in the case of my party, the same person to tell lies about the independence referendum. That's the truth about the lies of the independence referendum. "I'm not in contact with that individual, they are to be seen and heard in the media. I don't know what they think he thinks, but I think he is part of a script. I'm not doing a programme on me trying to manipulate votes, I
