

The Elden Ring is the creation of the lone hero on a quest to revive his dead twin brother, and he is on a path to make a new beginning for the destroyed world he once called home. With his almighty, yet aging, power, he sets out to make his enemies tremble. To carve out his name, he collects the elixirs of power – rare drops from enemies and other sources, the most valuable of which are Crystals and Wildsouls. By mastering the art of the Ancients, whose ancient knowledge and skills are revealed through battles, you can enhance your power in order to surpass the greatest Elden Lords in the world and complete your quest. You can also summon your own allies by combining gear items. I have attached only one ActorContext to my actors. Each context is a singleton. Currently, before I started taking performance into account, my application starts consuming 147.59GB of RAM. However, after I started to put in my effort and make sure that the actors are using the minimum amount of memory, the memory looks good: Summary of JVMs running (for 22 ms): Some of the actors seem not to use any memory: If this is the case, then does the actor's memory usage equally distribute across all the instances? A: According to the Akka documentation, an ActorContext consumes about 264k bytes of RAM. The old version was that context.childrenConsumers would internally store the subscribers, but the new version allows you to use context.childAt(index).subscriber, which should be more efficient. So I'd expect each Context to take up about 50MB. Also, remember that each context starts as a new process, so don't worry about that until you've exhausted the CPU. Also, they appear to use separate instances of Redis and Postgres, so that alone might cause some memory issues. Also, the statistics you linked could just be the garbage collector stats (assuming that's what they are). If you have 15 actors with a total of 3000 child contexts, that will
